Over the past decade, social auditing has taken on an important new role in the monitoring of labour and environmental standards. It has grown rapidly in recent years, involving various companies, consulting firms, labour unions and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in industries such as forestry, agriculture, clothing and footwear, and textiles. The combined pressure of campaigns by trade unions and NGOs, negative media attention and increasingly vocal public concern about working conditions have prompted some companies to have their factories audited. Concern about the credibility of such audits has been a major issue in the public debate about corporate social responsibility.

Auditing, inspection and monitoring are three terms used interchangeably to refer to the practice of evaluating a company's compliance with a set of standards. However, they represent distinct elements of this evaluation and thus provide a useful framework for the analysis of auditing a standard.

A social audit is undertaken by a company to evaluate the working conditions existing in a facility or supply chain. Unlike monitoring, it lasts anywhere from a few hours to a few days, and involves a number of steps, each one theoretically used in combination with the others. The performance of a social audit tends to involve three related processes : the document review, the site inspection and interviews with workers, management and third-party stakeholders. An auditor or team of auditors generally conducts the document review, site inspection and interviews. Social auditing does not involve continuous monitoring, although follow-up procedures are not uncommon.
